Robotic automation in food manufacture & distribution continues to grow as food and beverage companies adapt to meet the challenges of increasing consumer choice and demand.

Consumers and retailers are driving trends toward things such as increasing convenience, ready to eat foods, gluten free and organic lines, and shelf ready packaging.

In turn, these trends are driving innovation and capability in robotic automation to increasingly:

- handle volume demand at higher speeds,
- handle variation in the manufacturing process,
- support rapid product configuration and changeover,
- handle a growing range of packaging options to meet the demands of food retailers to present shelf ready product.

From the production of household staples to convenience and snack foods, alcoholic beverages, soft drinks, and confectionery... all food and beverage manufacturers can realise the step benefits of introducing increased robotic automation in the processing line to:

- maximise efficiency and turnaround at higher and higher volumes,
- increase accuracy and flexibility to handle multiple product configurations,
- drive down cost, optimise floorspace and reduce wastage,
- meet food safety requirements, and
- support greater stock control and traceability.
